

13th Annual Emerging Markets Network Conference

Mark your calendars for November 7th, 2008 for the 13th Annual Emerging Markets Network Conference to be held in Copley Formal Lounge at Georgetown University. This annual conference is planned and executed by a group of MBA students who comprise the Emerging Markets Network (EMN). The MBA students co-chairing this year's conference are Tom Spillane and Erik Theisen, both second-year full-time students. The Capital Markets Research Center provides financial support for the Emerging Markets Network Conference each year.

The conference brings together professionals across a number of disciplines and industries related to emerging markets to share their insights and experiences with students, faculty, and practitioners. This year's conference features panel discussions with representatives of the leading international economic consulting firms, emerging market private equity and investment interests, and multi-lateral and bi-lateral agencies that support development around the world. Students will have the opportunity to learn about different emerging market related job functions as well as to network with the various companies and organizations.

Students, faculty, and business professionals are cordially invited to this event. For additional information or to RSVP for the event, please contact Tom Spillane, at tjs58@georgetown.edu. Additional information about the event can also be obtained at the EMN's website <http://student.msb.edu/emn/>.
